Customer Reviews

Emerson Clark is Bloodkin to dragons. She is unaware of her dragon heritage and believes dragons do not honestly exist. Emerson works as a mediator between the Heolstor family and the surly Thane Ealdian on the Kingman Hills case. Although she does enjoy the perks that being a dragon-shifter awards her, Emerson hates the rigid control the Bloodkin Assembly has over its members. She plans to quit her job once this assignment is done and live outside the Bloodkin's jurisdiction with her foster siblings. The mediation turns dangerous when a mysterious person threatens Emerson's life if she continues the case. Thane opens her eyes to the unique intricacies involved of being a dragon. Emerson and Thane, both, learn not only the truth of her birth but who truly killed Thane's wife and son six-hundred years ago. Thane Ealdian is the last of the Ealdian black dragons. He has been preparing to journey to Havyn, a special isle where old dragon-shifters go to die, having made reluctant peace that the mystery of his wife and son's murder would remain unsolved. Thane fights the Night Song's irresistible lure when the remains of a dragon female and child are unearthed. Their discovery refuels his need for retribution, and he holds the Heolstor family responsible. Thane assumes the mediator assigned to the case is male because the name is commonly a male's name. Emerson surprises him. He does not want to like or admire the woman but Thane is unable to resist when she weathers his anger with cool aplomb. She invokes his dragon's interest and quells the pull of the Night Song. Emerson proves beneficial on revealing who the killer truly is and their reasons for killing his wife and son. Emerson won me from the start of the story.
